

Sean Glazebrook is an arts-integrated curriculum specialist, instructional coach, and workshop designer. He has been an instructor in New York and New Orleans, working at Tompkins Square Middle School, NOCCA|Riverfront, and McDonogh City Park Academy. In addition, Sean is a founding member of the NOLA Project, a New Orleans-based theatre company focused on producing original work and engaging new audiences. He holds a BFA in Theatre and History from New York University's Tisch School of the Arts, and a certificate in Shakespeare in Performance from the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art in London. He is currently an EdM candidate at the Harvard Graduate School of Education, and a graduate research assistant at Project Zero. He has completed the John F. Kennedy Center Artists as Educators track.

Sean has facilitated more than 120 professional development workshops for teachers and teaching artists nationwide, and has presented his work and research at numerous conferences including the Kennedy Center Annual Partners Meeting, the American Alliance for Theatre and Education National Conference, the Tennessee Create! conference, the Mississippi Whole Schools conference, and the Alameda County Integrated Learning Institute.